at the Court of Dresden; Together With Several Other Pieces on Various Subjects I fhall go to town in four or five days, and carry Ibaek with me a little more hearing than I brought but yet, not half enough for common ufe. One wants ready pocket money much oftener than one wants great fums; and, to ufe a very odd exprefiion, I want to hear at light. I love every-day fenfes, every day wit and entertainment; a man who is only good on holydays, is good for very little. Adieu! Excerpt from The Letters and Works of Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield, Vol. 5 of 5: Including Numerous Letters and Papers To give only two instances: Lord Chesterfield mentions the expected death of Queen Caroline, as what I take to be the present situation of affairs. As hitherto printed, the expression has been altered to the very unbecoming one, I hope. Thus, again, where Lord Chesterfield speaks of the Roman His tory after the first five hundred years, a change of to the last, transforms his remark from an acute into a silly one. The Editor is very far from having any wish to find fault with other contemporary publications, and he acknowledges the difficulty there may often be in detecting or correcting the error of transcribers, but he thinks that, in justice to Lord Chesterfield and to his readers, he was bound not to leave unnoticed the variations which he has observed.
